RESEARCH PROJECT & FIELDWORK

Current project, Competing Muslim Representations in the United States: Citizenship, Gender and Religion. The project draws on extensive discourse analysis of a wide range of public representations (visual and textual material) on topics related to belonging and citizenship, gender, and religion. The main purpose is to document and analyze the multiple and divergent positions of Muslim key figures, leaders, and organizations on topics pertaining to Islam and Muslims in relation to American society and politics to demonstrate the diversity of standpoints and perspectives on what constitute “Muslim American” identity and politics. A particular focus is on representations of intersectionality, Muslim women's role and Muslim feminisms in political discourse as well as in Women's Marches and the Black Lives Matter movement since 2017.

I am also currently conducting an ethnographic research project on Muslim youth in Milwaukee titled Young, Muslim, and American: Diversities of Identities, Geographies and Politics, which centers on the social, political, religious, and personal expressions of Muslim youth cultures and identities, and what they suggest with respect to the future directions of Islam in the post-9/11 era. The project involves fieldwork and in-depth interviews with Muslim American youth (within the age group 18-25 years), including politically and religiously active, secular, as well as non-organized and “non-mosque.”

Current research project The Muslim Milwaukee Project (together with Profs. Caroline Seymour-Jorn and Kristin Sziarto) entails a collaborative partnership with Muslim community leaders. Fieldwork at different mosques and Muslim organizations and designing household and individual surveys to map the small but growing Muslim community in Milwaukee. Conducting focus groups and individual interviews on belonging and experiences of discrimination in different spaces and neighborhoods. Book project, Muslims in Milwaukee: Place, Identities and Activism.

Research project Gender Identity and Activism among Muslim Women in the Midwest (2007-2012) entailed fieldwork on Muslim women’s organizations in the Midwest, their activism, and identity formation as American Muslim women. University of Wisconsin-Milwaukee.

Becoming Muslim. Between the fall of 1997 and spring of 2000, I did in-depth ethnographic interviews in Sweden and in the U.S. with female Muslim converts. Fieldwork on identity-making, change and continuity, personal models and transcultural encounters with family, friends, and others. Doctoral work, Department of European Ethnology, Lund University, Sweden.

Fieldwork in Kiruna, Sweden (in the fall of 1994 and the following spring of 1995). The research focused on the immigration policy and its local implementation and organization in the city of Kiruna. Interviews were done with the police, people working within health care and schools, politicians, lawyers, and representatives from local organizations, the refugee camp as well as the Swedish Board of Immigration. Graduate Assistant, Department of European Ethnology, Lund University, Sweden.

September 1993 to March 1994. Fieldwork in the county of Kristianstad, Sweden. Through participant observations and ethnographic interviews, the research focused on the wedding traditions and identity-making of immigrants in the county. Project Assistant for the County Museum of Kristianstad, Sweden.
